Recognize all heroes in your community

It's not who wins or loses it's how you play the game. Well, that is a load of crap isn't it?

Watching anything news-related or Olympics-related in recent weeks proves winning is all that matters in any society or country.

We watch politics and winning is what counts, regardless of morals or ethics. We see the justice systems in action and we clearly see right, wrong, or crazy doesn't matter and only the loudest public outcries seem to count. The Olympic fans care most about the winners and those who worked just as hard but did not win may be quickly forgotten.

Entrepreneurs, inventors and Nobel Prize winners often fly under the radar of public praise, but are easily scrutinized if something goes wrong.

We need heroes and our Olympians coming home with medals are people to look up to, to prove we can do anything we want if we work hard enough to get it.

Even though we are conditioned to believe in winners, we know deep down there are no losers when it comes to the Olympics.

There are many employees, athletes, volunteers, parents and creators who deserve praise for doing well in some way. Perhaps it is fighting and working with a purpose — and much of it goes unnoticed.

Throughout the Olympics, words were used over and over again to describe the events and the athletes — solid, effort, strong, hopeful, tough, confident, experienced and winner. These are the same words we all hope are used to describe everyday successes.

About Staffing

Yes, we will celebrate our country's Olympians as they arrive home and I hope we choose to cheerfully acknowledge the athletes who fought just as hard as our winners, but were unable to bring home a medal.

Then, as we all move on from the Olympics, I hope we recognize other heroes in our communities who are also focused and dedicated.

Welcome home athletes. We are very proud of your commitment to your sport and being your best while representing our country with pride and grace. We need to show how proud we are of hard work regardless of who wins and who doesn't, even if we are ingrained with the belief being No. 1 is all that matters.
